Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from Barnyard Manure, Its Value and Uses Where the retention of moisture during a critical period of growth is needed for some special crop, no better blanket can be found than stable manure. When rain falls, the soluble portions of the manure are leached into the soil below to feed the plant roots. When drought prevails the coating of manure effectually stops the undue evaporation of moisture from the soil without depriving it of aeration. Tomato and pepper plants in the garden or forcing house, late potatoes and cabbages respond to the manure mulch. While succeeding crops will also derive great benefit from the manure plowed under. It seems likely that the marked benefits found in top dressing meadows with fresh manure may be partly due to the mulching effects of the manure which has settled down around the grass crowns where it prevents excessive evaporation, through the hottest days of summer, as well as feeds the shallow rooted grasses by leaching in the spring and winter rains. Without the machine spreading which properly distributes the mulch over meadow lands it would be well nigh impossible to secure uniformly good results. Although barnyard manure is a valuable asset to American farmers if saved carefully and applied intelligently, in practice it suffers heavy losses in value from at least three sources, all of which are avoidable.
