Excerpt from The Review of Reviews for Australasia: May, 1912 All this means that he had made a place for himself in the hearts of the people, from which he could not be dislodged. Both high and low respected him as a man who would not, indeed, could not, use opportunities that came in his way simply to advance his personal interests. He was a giant in reform. His personal goodness his sense of justice, his passion for righteousness, made him a deadly foe in any combat with wrong that he entered. When he set out to fight he carried no hamper, and went in with the single purpose of slaying the wrong he attacked. Because his vision of the ideal was so clear, he could not stay at half measures. To him wrong was a thing not to be compromised with, but destroyed. Needless to say, he had to resort to extraordinary means sometimes to accomplish his ends but he never shrank from any ordeal, however severe. This was made evident in his attack on the hideous crime of child procurement which had assumed proportions in London that were appalling. He demonstrated, with the aid of some godly women friends, and some of the most irreproachable men in London, that it was ridiculously easy to purchase for immoral purposes children of tender years. It was necessary, in order to prove his accusations to the hilt, to show that it was possible to do this. Not one breath of personal scandal could ever attach to him in his pursuit of the. Hideous evil is but, through defective and biased justice, which could not see that the salvation of thousands...
