Not illustrated. 1840 Excerpt: . . . JACOT; AN ADVENTURE ON BOARD THE ST. GEORGE. The packet ship St. George left New-York, bound to London, on the first of May, 183-. It was towed, as is customary, to Sandy Hook by a steamer filled with the passengers and their friends. A passage across the Atlantic is now of such common occurrence, that it no longer excites the sensations it did even ten years ago; but there is still sufficient danger hovering over that wide ocean, which, added to the uncertainties of a long absence, gives a deep interest to the parting scene. . . . The most careless observer must have felt that morning on board the St. George the beauty of the various bonds by which the human family are bound together. Here was a father standing with thoughtful aspect beside his son, a young artist, who was going to study art in the Old World. His sister sitting with her hand in his, and looking as if she would fain grow to him. A young bride was clinging to her mother, whose protection she was for the first time to leave, to follow the fortunes of her husband to the Old World. Brothers were to part who had till then slept under their fathers roof, and some there were surrounded by loving friends. From all this social pain and pleasure there was but one excluded. This was a little girl, who might be thirteen, possibly fourteen years old, for...
