Excerpt: .least do their best to produce that stupor which they so gravely prognosticate. Nor can it be matter of surprise, that they deter some, who would otherwise be disposed to labour for God, and repress the ardour of others who are actually engaged in the work. To snatch sinners as brands from the fire, is of itself sufficiently laborious, without meeting the cold and repulsive conduct of those, to whom from their situation and character, we are naturally disposed to look for encouragement. But can any thing be more unfair and disingenuous, than for these individuals to employ that very state of dulness, in the production of which they themselves so materially assist, --as an argument against revivals? Indeed they are not qualified to form an opinion on the subject; for even supposing that the cause of their dismal forebodings relative to the work...
